Whispers from The Brighter World

Saturday, March 13, 1999 – 5:00 p.m.

Thank your children-in-heart, who become also mine.

They have done good work. Life will not always be easy for them, but it is all mapped out; they have accepted it like that. They will be at the right place when needed. May they advance in purity and surrender. We will say more later.

You have known each other in other lives, hence your current relationship. Shower them with love; they will return it to you. Remain in contact until the end. You will guide them after your departure. Convey all this to them with my blessings.

Babuji

(5:30 p.m. For centuries in Western India, the Baul community has led a life of troubadours, beseeching divine intervention through music. Praised by Rabindranath Tagore, the great Indian poet, these mystics are neither Moslem nor Buddhist. They say, "the road to the Absolute is blocked by the temples, the mosques." Their devotion is moving, and their gatherings impressive. I understood, after having seen this report on television, why Babuji urged me to watch it immediately after our contact, though my state of mind did not lend itself to it. It is completely in the spirit of this great universal movement, beyond religions, which he heralds for future times.)
