Yes, 'all is nothing and God is everything' is a nice definition that summarises well the way a mystic can see life, and it corresponds to the one you have had for a long time. This formula is short, but edifying. It brings one back to the main thing, and in difficult moments it can help to put things in perspective. Man must have points of reference that can help him find his strength in an appropriate way, as well as a line of conduct meant to make him live from this point of view and according to its wishes. Our candidates have made their choice; they know where they want to go and which direction should be given to their life. Many human beings have understood the true reasons for their existence on this Earth. It is a privilege; all do not have this luck.

"By fulfilling themselves spiritually little by little, they take their brothers – less enlightened than them – along with them, in a vibratory aura that will change the course of their life, more or less, in the long term. It is a law prevailing in the ethereal spheres, where the destiny of beings is sealed in the vast projects relating to the evolution of humanity."
