Friday, February 27, 2004 - 10:00 AM

Human foolishness is great, and true knowledge is not widespread. It is necessary to carry on regardless of the behaviours of certain individuals, and to advance in one's own convictions while ignoring them: that is true wisdom. It is distressing to see what is happening on the Earth, but in the present state of affairs, what else can be expected?

"The wise man tries to make his way through this world but it is not easy to make oneself heard. The spirit of present time does not lend itself to it. He must work for it in his own way; willingness is welcome. We have no miracle cures, in the way humans define them; big things being achieved exceed them, and that is good. How could they appreciate what they cannot themselves grasp in the great universal movements?

"Knowledge, in every respect, is limited in this world. Each one interprets the events according to one's own convictions, having nothing to do with cosmic reality. Our aspirants belong to a category of human beings grabbed by the divine breath and inspired with the prospect of an upliftment of humanity. We can only be delighted for them. They are advancing and becoming aware of certain truths still rejected on the whole by most of the individuals.

"That is how the world goes, slowly—too slowly for those who aspire to live in an atmosphere of spiritual openness and broadening of conscience. The world, as it stands currently, cannot receive more. The true treasures cannot be distributed without discernment. The era of knowledge is taking shape on the horizon of life on this Earth. It will have to overcome the ruins of current civilizations where common sense is cruelly lacking, and to be rebuilt in a real spirit of peace."

Babuji