Thursday, November 25, 2004 - 10:00 AM

To serve is primarily accepting. There are stages to be reached in confidence and surrender, without which nothing is possible. The human being, limited in terms of his perceptions and understanding of phenomena surpassing him, cannot rely on his assessment of divine service. Choices are to be made which are fraught with consequences. Love allows one to iron out the difficulties. To rely on the Divine, on one's Master, the servant of the great causes for which he works in this world, is a sign of wisdom. Opportunities are given in this life; they will not occur again. Therefore nothing should be neglected. This aspect must be considered seriously.

"To serve the Mission is to take part in this great movement, which will be remembered in the history of this world. Its action will keep growing and helping seeking hearts that have not yet found the targeted spiritual food. At the dawn of the new era, which is good for this suffering humanity, men can only grow and thrive on all the levels; time will do its work as usual. In this case, divine power sets up what men, even if they are observant, cannot even conceive.

"To serve, however little it may be, is to take part in this great movement capable of transforming the world of men, overwhelmed by evils which will keep growing, while waiting for the final outcome."

Babuji