Whispers from The Brighter World
A Fifth Revelation

Wednesday, September 28, 2005 – 10:00 a.m.

Dying, in the sense understood by men, does not exist. Our brother and sister abhyasis know this and they are developing themselves accordingly, while fearing this shift from one world to another. It is only an additional experience – that's all – inevitable and different according to the circumstances. Fears are appeased with sadhana. Our aspirants, relying on their Master and their destiny, must reassure themselves on this issue that disturbs them more than is sensible. One's life passes very quickly, and most lives sink into oblivion; only a few emblematic figures leave behind them a memory, good or bad according to the circumstances.

"Others who experienced power for a while were irremediably erased from memories. As an element of the Great Whole, an integral part of its power, the human creature must adapt to its manifestation wherever it may take place; it is only a life pulse, a vibration appropriate to its ambient conditions. Being limited to its microcosm, activating moving particles of energy, life follows its evolutionary and destructive cycle, according to laws specific to the entire universe. There is no exception in this area; the blossoming of life, wherever it may take place, fluctuates and is subjected to the elements. 'All is nothing, God is all' – this formula is a good illustration of reality. Man must strive towards the good, his own and that of others, while referring to a principle of life – that is the respect for life in all its forms. The rest is only incidental.

"Only God's glory should be praised. Man's glory does not mean anything in this world, which is only a vast illusion. All are small and equal before Him. That is the way it goes."
