Whispers from The Brighter World

Wednesday, December 12, 2012 – 10:00 a.m.

The conquest of this sacred space is the noblest goal of an incarnation, and each of our abhyasis is giving it their best. The road is long and fraught with pitfalls; avoiding them while being surrendered to the inner Master gives the necessary strength. In the face of trials, each person reacts in their own way; love brings benefits where human strength may be lacking. Nothing is simple in this world and no one is spared. Developing within oneself the necessary strength to face up to life denotes a wisdom that is praiseworthy. It is said that trials make people grow; each human being reacts to them as best they can. Over time, abhyasis who are committed and steadfast in their practice notice that they assess things differently. They learn how to put things into perspective, to otherwise accept what life offers them and with less resentment when it doesn't conform to their aspirations. There lies the beginning of a promising journey; advancing in a way of love opens up endless prospects. Beyond this world there is an elsewhere where everything gets clarified, helping one understand why it is necessary to endure so much here below.

Some incarnations are easier than others; when the path previously travelled was productive, it then leads to life experiences that are more and more fruitful. A spiritual commitment saves valuable time through the course of a life. One's behaviour is, in general, a factor of success. Regular practice should help one overcome certain character traits that are incompatible with real progress. It's up to each one to do their best by developing within themselves this capacity to love and to rise above the limiting contingencies of the material world. To all, we wish significant progress and a full blossoming in this productive practice.

Blessings.
