Whispers from The Brighter World

Friday, June 26, 2015 — 10:00 a.m.

Life is a constant struggle — nothing can be attained without effort. There lies the very principle of this life in all its manifestations. The whole of creation is astounding in its diversity and power of action; human beings are very small in the face of it. Their power has limits. Sooner or later one realises this and bows down with a greater or lesser degree of wisdom. Wisdom is the goal, yet it is necessary to recognise its importance and cultivate it within oneself as the most valuable asset. Following a spiritual process opens up horizons onto the importance of committing oneself beyond this material life — a life that is devoid of enlightening perspectives on the subtle level. What remains of an incarnation? Although all incarnations are counted and recorded, great deeds are not commonplace. Honesty and wisdom are invaluable assets; they constitute a human being's true wealth when the time of assessment has come.

"Everyone does what they can. It is wise to adjust oneself on the spiritual level. There, at least, no effort is futile. Interiorising oneself and going towards the ultimate goal is the most beautiful quest. It provides access to the sacred space, to true joy — that which delights the soul in all its subtlety. Diving into oneself, being nourished by this unique vibration, is the most beautiful objective. Its achievement enchants the soul and opens up perspectives on the infinite splendour. Everything starts and ends there — such is the only true goal, the supreme reward. This is how it is."
