Whispers from The Brighter World

Thursday, March 15, 2001 – 8:00 a.m.

Current medicine ignores an important aspect of the human being that will only be revealed much later. Not only would this dimension not be understood, but it would be wrongly interpreted and would not serve people. The karmic aspect, which is so important, is ignored. There would be much to say on the subject, but what's the point in addressing it since it cannot, in the present state of affairs, be taken seriously.

An individual's personality as a whole is determined by his or her karmic attributes: the life path with all that follows from it, the genetic make-up, health, character and the resulting behaviours. The channel represented by family, race and social conditions, all is chosen according to the lessons to be drawn from the incarnation. Health capital has an important place in this scheme. It has many interweavings throughout a person's life.

Medicine very often goes astray. It doesn't consider the person as a whole and narrows down what it does not understand to subjective and erroneous causes. It will take a long time for it to rid itself of hasty and facile theories with which it increasingly satisfies itself. By narrowing down all or most of the unexplainable pathologies to the psyche, it embarks on a simplistic path without getting to the heart of the real problems.

In a few decades, minds that have wandered down dead-end roads will open up to the reality of the being.
