Whispers from The Brighter World

Saturday, March 24, 2001 – 10:00 a.m.

What you all call death is in reality a rebirth. Another form of life continues elsewhere. This continuity is enriched by the numerous Earthly experiences that constitute an important aspect of a being's evolution – so many lessons to draw from an incarnation and from experiences good or bad, in the sense that life gives them in its evaluation criteria. Their actual value lies elsewhere, this appreciation taking place outside the norms decreed by human beings. What seems detestable to you can turn out to be very instructive and enriching.

This is why wisdom would have humans accept life's tribulations, with its trials of all sorts, as blessings.

They most often make this observation while taking stock of their incarnation after having left the Earth. Reality appears to them in all its truth. Most of the time they remain astounded. In the final analysis, this life, at times so painful, proves to be an exemplary enrichment. One's assessment of this point leaves something to be desired. Be confident, nothing happens to you all without reason. Only innate or acquired wisdom will enable you to appreciate this.
