Whispers from The Brighter World

Friday, April 16, 2004 – 10:00 a.m.

Birth, death, and rebirth; these words characterize the various manifestations of life, punctuated over time according to its various aspects – that is how it is for human beings.

Life, an emanation of the Divine, is precious, manifold and rich with an asset that completely escapes human beings. The divine power manifests itself in the slightest breath, animating each particle, and omnipresent in the infinitely small, as well as in the infinitely great. Human beings should have this truth firmly rooted in their minds and assimilate it to the extent of feeling it within themselves, in their most imperceptible movements, conscious or not. As future times lead them to a certain form of knowledge, they will have to take a different stand as regards this reality.

In this sense, the step to be taken is impressive, as humans are strangers to themselves and science further misleads them through erroneous assessments. There is no such thing as chance in the great movement of life, nor is there necessity. The theme of a famous book* shows the shortcomings of science, which leaves aside what is, in reality, essential.

By neglecting this major aspect, it deliberately ignores what can enlighten it about the origin of matter. It takes time for humans to understand where the truth lies. Will they achieve this understanding in this century? They have no choice; otherwise they will miss a rare opportunity, fundamental for the future, and one that will not occur again anytime soon.

May those who are wise recognize and seize their chance to rise above the current condition of humanity that is floundering in an unspeakable cesspool, and may they benefit with maximum enlightenment.
