Whispers from The Brighter World

Tuesday, April 24, 2001 – 8:00 a.m.

This beautiful flowering of the Mission – as you fervently wish it – you will not see on this Earth, but you can believe me, it will occur.

We are all working here to that end, and each one of you, our aspirants, you are also working towards this great achievement.

That should motivate you all and make you advance, whatever the current circumstances. One should never trust appearances; humans are changing, but the destiny of the Earth does not change. It is all mapped out, irrevocably.

Life has surprises in store: did you think that one day you would write all these messages? The discovery of Sahaj Marg, when you made it, did not seem of capital importance to you, but see how over the years it has transformed your life.

The destiny of each one is realized at all costs; human beings cannot change anything about it.

In broad outline, it is achieved, and they should better adapt themselves to the events emerging during their existence.

Regrets are useless; they cannot restart their journey afresh, they can only try to make the rest of their lives live up to their aspirations and to succeed, by getting down to it with faith and determination.
