Whispers from The Brighter World

Saturday, August 7, 1999 – 8:00 a.m.

Yes, M and J will leave, such is their destiny. No matter the distances, you will always be connected one way or another. You will reunite; it is written. Such is life. Some are born and die in their village without ever having left it, and others roam the world. Each has their life, their mission, their karma which must be fulfilled at all costs. Imagine – all of you – that your stay on Earth is an initiatory journey and that, one day, you will return to your fatherland, enriched by all your experiences. You will take stock of it all and realize what it has really brought you.

There are birds that live in cages and migratory birds; which ones have a more enriching life? Enrichment takes place inside and not through travel memories. Which of the two species is privileged? Not necessarily that which one would imagine. You all tend to think that only travels and great epics can develop the mind as well as qualities of strength and courage.

The monk who lives cloistered in his monastery, without ever going out, can acquire great inner riches and feel joys that are not necessarily experienced by great travellers, who sometimes have only a superficial view of things. Each person has what is necessary for them. Do not believe that only the greatest adventures allow for a faster evolution. Seeing, knowing, are not enough to give you such quality as to unite with the inner Master.

All is possible and can be achieved in any circumstance. There are no specific criteria to reach the goal more quickly. Only what is already inside you can thrive wherever you are, if you want it to, and especially with a Master's help.
