Yes, we can carry on with this issue: love. We have not run out of arguments, but they are insufficient; love cannot be explained. One experiences it, feels it and it must be transcended. It is at the same time self-sacrifice and capacity to receive. One should meditate on this formula: self-sacrifice, complete sacrifice, unreservedly, and unlimited capacity to receive. Both must balance out and be really experienced.

"It is true that not everyone is blessed with it. Speaking about it is important, and being sensitized on this aspect is too. We address the issue in the Mission by trying to get to the heart of things; that is new, and was not done a few years ago, especially in the Occident. Hearts are opening out; the work is being done imperceptibly. Imagine that one day, you all will be nothing else but love; it would be a kind of Eden. It will take a long process to get there, but speaking about its reality and its importance constitutes quite an event. A great step is taken. It is well to organize seminars on this topic. That opens consciousness; all arguments evoked make their way into the minds and cannot help but touch them. One day or the other, the greatest number will open up to this truth. In a sense, love is a more powerful force than the atom: it can transform the world, revive it and make it radiant. It's up to you to really want it and to work in your heart to make it become reality."
