Life is hard for all that live on the Earth. The various kingdoms have to fight to survive. The law that governs this planet and the entire universe is like that. Evolution goes through upheavals of all sorts, but balance is maintained and that's wonderful. Nature must pursue its immutable renewal. Everything lives, dies and is renewed. As for man, he becomes incarnate on the Earth for the amount of time it takes for his evolution, and then he continues his progress in other places.

"The balance of the Earth is like that of human beings; it is fragile and yet, shaken more and more. Although they are largely informed of the evil they do, they continue in the same direction and the process of degradation accelerates; it is irreversible.

"Is progress doomed to bring about self-destruction? No, that is not God's intention. It will take a lot of time until man understands that he must foremost respect creation and consider as secondary the lure of gain. Man's well-being should be privileged above all, but we are nowhere near this wisdom."
