Wednesday, October 27, 1999 - 8:00 a.m.

The loneliness of a Master is great. Whom can he trust? So many initiatives are motivated by self-interest! True love, which is not like that, is rare. With time, many disappointments make of him a lonely man. He can count only on some people, hence his mistrust in the face of many situations. One should understand him and not be surprised by any of his reactions. He lives on the Earth to carry out his mission; this exile far from us weighs on him and we understand his desire to see the end of it, but he must go on until the end. Therefore, always try to understand your Master and to love him above all, to see in him the supreme guide who, having become incarnate like you, can do an enormous work in your favour.

"If he is not available, smiling and at your disposal as many would like him to be, what he achieves for you is much more important than all sorts of civilities which would please you, but which are not of capital importance. Trust him and never expect him to become a father, a friend. He is all that at the same time, but especially, he is a Master whose greatness you can't imagine."

Babuji