Whispers from The Brighter World

Saturday, October 23, 1999 – 8:00 a.m.

Life is hard for all that live on Earth. The various kingdoms have to fight to survive. Such is the law that governs this planet and the entire universe. Evolution goes through upheavals of all sorts, but balance is maintained and that is admirable. Nature must pursue its immutable renewal. Everything lives, dies and renews itself. As for human beings, they reincarnate on Earth for the amount of time it takes for their evolution, and then they continue their journey in other places. The balance of the Earth is like that of human beings – fragile, and yet more and more battered. Although largely informed of the harm they do, humans continue in the same direction, and the process of degradation accelerates – it is irreversible.

Must progress lead to self-destruction? No, God doesn't want it that way. It will still take a lot of time for human beings to understand that they must first and foremost respect the creation and put the lure of gain second. The well-being of humankind should be privileged above all, but we are a long way from that wisdom.
