Whispers from The Brighter World

Sunday, December 12, 1999 – 10:00 a.m.

By being so close to me, you couldn't but attract His gaze; what could be more natural. You can see that we accept you as you are. We have tenderness for you because you know how to recognize your weaknesses. So many human beings believe themselves to be perfect and give themselves the right to judge others in every respect, to the point where it is pathological. They would do well to look at their own backyard and take a serious look at the weeds therein, before dwelling on those of their neighbour.

You can see that if we address you so often, it's sometimes a pretext to arrive at generalities.

We have told you often enough, everything has its raison d'être. Each one of you is a case for us, we observe you all and we surround you with care. What gardener is so attentive! Do you all realize that you are the objects of constant observation?

You are never alone, whether you are happy or unhappy; we never lose sight of any of you.
