Whispers from The Brighter World

Thursday, December 16, 1999 – 8:00 a.m.

Few human beings know the true meaning of love and really live it. It's not about a short-lived blaze, a very common human feeling that is easily brought into play, that comes and goes. One gives it, one takes it back, it fluctuates over the course of days. That love is a substitute, having nothing to do with the reality of love that issues from the Divine. This one is immense, deep, inalterable, without any limit; it loses itself in infinity, in light, in beauty, and is but one with all of that.

You can only imagine it, aspire to live it, to feel it very deeply in yourselves. It is a sublime state; your sadhana will lead you all to its golden shores one day and you'll understand that it cannot be a human notion, even if you come close to it and your heart is already prepared to receive it like a divine monarch.

The more you advance, the more you feel its effects; they captivate you and attract you to it. One day, inescapably, you will succumb to its delights.
