Tuesday, August 17, 2004 – 10:00 a.m.

You are at the heart of these messages, my child, and your states of mind inspire them over time.

You are living in this world, and we adjust our remarks to what our aspirants might feel at different moments of their Earthly existence.

Inevitably, they all go through the same range of feelings, marking them more particularly at certain times, in both joy and sorrow. It's precisely this diversity that shapes them and, depending on their philosophy, can make them grow and advance in wisdom. No one can escape the vagaries of an incarnation; each one of them is important, it puts a being in the best conditions for a positive experience.

How will it be led, which reminiscences of past lives will interfere with this one and be able to influence it! Whatever the case may be, life is the best school; until the end it will hold lessons from which the wise can benefit. A spiritual process helps one to put things into perspective, to try not to repeat the same mistakes, to forgive, to understand in others what is different and even shocking. Diversity is inherent in this world, it constitutes its main feature.

All our brothers and sisters illustrate this statement perfectly: although spiritually, they are all going in the same direction they exhibit differences in other respects. This trait is peculiar to humanity. Where would the challenge lie if uniformity and simplicity prevailed in this world, one made of peace and harmony.

It has not yet reached that stage; working in this direction is our goal, and we are applying ourselves to it.

Babuji