Whispers from The Brighter World

Monday, February 11, 2002 – 8:00 a.m.

Life is like a grand competition, with its defeats and its victories. The two aspects are interesting; it is enough to be clear-headed and, in both cases, to know how to draw the necessary conclusions. The positive result of this becomes enriching.

Wisdom is not easily acquired; repeated trials transform the being and help it move forward on this path, when they are well understood. They can develop faith or banish it, depending on the heart's inclination.

Life is full of lessons for those who really want to see it that way. A deeply-felt faith gives it an aura of greatness and acceptance, which places it in a very different context. Each trial takes on a particular meaning when it is well understood. It is not easy to live in a state of surrender while undergoing this battle with oneself; the soul is enriched and, by accepting defeat, comes out of it with greater maturity. Everything is brought into play to this end. When the stakes are high, everything is accomplished for the good. A higher being takes advantage of all experiences, good or bad; it finds its way thanks to its own discernment.

Each situation has its usefulness. How will it be lived? It's all there. It's enough to try to stay the course against all odds.
