Whispers from The Brighter World

Saturday, May 29, 2004 – 10:30 a.m.

Our brothers and sisters will read these messages more easily than some of our books. We must adapt to the times, to the way of living in an era where the senses are permanently caught up by the effects of modern life. These writings will more easily call for daily reading, giving the reader something to think about.

Let your heart go, my child, don't hinder it, it is in this state that you capture us best.

This advice is valid for all; loving opens the doors and attracts the Master's attention, thus freeing them from the obstacles hindering their progress.

The goal is the same one for all our aspirants; the process must comply with a few rules if they want to succeed. Our faithful know them, yet they happen to forget them through negligence or overconfidence.

The practice requires ceaseless repetition; true motivation means that it becomes second nature, without seeming burdensome in the organization of a day. Fervent devotees consider their practice as being a necessity.

Everything is done, in our way, to meet their expectations. As the Mission becomes structured, it will offer greater opportunities for meetings in ashrams offering seminars. Mixing with one another on these special days is gratifying; they mobilize the attention of our brothers and sisters, focusing them on what's essential for them. Regularly planning days of this kind helps our brothers and sisters meet, in a setting conducive to bringing them closer together. Differences of opinion, asperities of each one's character, must give way to meditation and devotion, attracting our blessings.
