Saturday, August 25, 2001 – 8:00 a.m.

Don't underestimate yourself as you do. Accept at least the recognition of your work.

The value of a human being lies outside all considerations of this world. Birth, financial standing and degrees are temporary and factitious assets, linked to the present incarnation.

They mean nothing more than attributes without real value, except for placing the entity in circumstances conducive to the experience awaiting it.

Humans are so small; why should they take themselves so seriously and claim that the favourable conditions where they can evolve are of their own making? If their pride pushes them to crush their fellow beings with their purported superiority, they are badly mistaken.

They had, from the start, to correct this weakness in their nature, which is a handicap in their evolution.

May you all become fully aware of your smallness: you are not superior to any of your fellow creatures. Keep a rigorous check on yourself; who are you to judge and consider yourselves better, more intelligent and more gifted than your fellows?

Instead, give fervent thanks for being privileged in this life, if such is the case. You don't know what the next life holds for you, so be humble before your brethren.

Babuji