Whispers from The Brighter World

Sunday, November 28, 2004 – 10:00 a.m.

To take on a physical body is inevitably to deprive oneself of extrasensory perceptions and a range of knowledge not belonging to this world. That's how it is and science can change nothing about it, not now or ever. Anything belonging to this world is limited. Humans should understand this, the most erudite must accept it if they are wise. Some of them are wise, they recognize their limitations and have no pretention of wanting to change the world. What's more, they admit that progress, as they conceive it, does not make human beings any happier. It creates more and more needs and, in the final analysis, it complicates their lives, as they recognize that their ancestors had a simpler life that was not necessarily less happy. Some human beings have gifts, quite remarkable perceptions, and they are not properly recognized in a superficial world not attentive to anything out of the ordinary. Many claim they have those gifts, but they are only pale imitations, their information generally coming from a lower astral level.

All these phenomena are not recognized, whatever their level of truth, and they are generally ridiculed by ignorant people. We cannot change anything about this. How will our brothers and sisters accept these messages? The most open-minded will be able to tell the difference and recognize the authenticity of these writings. The prophecies by certain beings have marked history, without their sources being updated or challenged. It doesn't matter, the voice of wisdom makes itself heard whenever possible, and happy are those who pay attention to it. Our spiritual way will not be outdone in tomorrow's world, which will be open to the many possibilities of the human brain, repository of a knowledge unexploited because it is currently ignored.
