Whispers from The Brighter World

Tuesday, March 5, 2002 – 10:00 a.m.

he humblest creature, the most self-effacing one, can lead a richer life than a king.

The heart of such a being can conceal the wonder of wonders without anyone knowing it. It thrives on this special treasure and does not envy the fate of those recognized by the world as 'great'. We take extreme examples, but this kind of treasure can be acquired by all those who call for it with sincerity and fervour. This state is not given easily; it has to be earned. It is possible to lead a very active life and to cultivate within oneself a kind of detachment from worldly matters. The spiritual life can be dissociated from the social role that the entity must assume. Only the being's profound aspiration to follow his or her way must prevail. It must find its place in the busiest life and blossom over time.

Wise persons know how to take things into account. They make choices that do not contradict each other. They are complex in their essence, but they can perfectly balance their lives in a satisfactory way.

Everything is possible to persons of goodwill. They advance in life peacefully, knowing that they must see the experience through to the end, doing the best they can.
