Whispers from The Brighter World

Monday, October 25, 2004 – 10:00 a.m.

Human beings, whatever their evolution, need to rely on tangible aspects, in some circumstances where they are assailed by doubt, when they have to make decisions. No one escapes these characteristics that are specifically human.

The greatness of humans resides in their courage in life, and also in their weakness when it leads them to humility. Without it, they can become appalling, cloaked in a spirit of superiority. The concept of equilibrium here is also critical; nobody is perfect in this world and humans must try out a series of states in order to shape themselves intelligently. Their spiritual quest helps them to have a clear understanding of themselves and to correct themselves, as far as possible. Each person's path is specific; the diversity of personalities is such that harmony between people remains illusory.

This living mosaic is not lacking in colour and movement; finding oneself and finding one's bearings in that sphere of influence is not easy.

The refuge of faith gives strength; meditation makes it possible to face oneself and to understand the reasons for an incarnation corresponding to the work to be completed. Human frailty is such, life hangs by a thread; each minute is important in this countdown, giving several options. Cultivating love within oneself gives inspiration, sheds light on the needs for the soul to quench its thirst for the Divine.

May all our brothers and sisters find in our way an answer to this quest towards the ineffable splendour.
