Whispers from The Brighter World

Sunday, June 11, 2000 – 10:00 a.m.

My son has more people around him than you. In spite of that, he is alone and tired. The load is heavy and a human being sometimes suffers from not being able to solve everything, to do more, so that the Mission can expand and structure itself faster.

Your heart is moved by his weariness because you experience it as well for other reasons. All your good thoughts cannot but touch him.

It's true that many influential thinkers of your time, considered as such by 'the elite', have been and are on the wrong track. They impress false concepts on the minds of many individuals. Their own reasoning will perhaps bring them back to reality. Humans need points of reference, they follow in footsteps that don't necessarily lead them where they must go.

One day, matured by their own experience, they discover their misjudgements and stop at the crossroads in search of a way forward that is better suited to their state of mind. It is sometimes necessary to journey a long time to understand the true aspiration of that which is called the soul, and then everything is to be done or redone.
