Whispers from The Brighter World

Sunday, October 8, 2000 – 10:00 a.m.

In humans, the heart is the administrator. Its most important satellites are the brain and the glands. The brain receives the orders and relays them – we have already mentioned this principle. Numerous receptors pick up these instructions and act accordingly. This whole system runs at the speed of light. Fundamental discoveries will one day be made on this subject.

The most up-to-date computer does not measure up to this performance. Nothing can equal creation. The results obtained by IT are prodigious, but they are the fruit of human intelligence, applied to the development of this hardware.

Humans have created this monster that will end up devouring them. Its power will become such that there will no longer be a place for them in society. At the speed things are going, a few IT specialists will be enough to run the factories. The administrative wheels and economies of countries will be regulated in the same way.

What will become of human beings confronted with this gigantism? The answer will be given in centuries to come.
