Whispers from The Brighter World

Monday, October 9, 2000 – 10:00 a.m.

The transmission of impulses taking place at the level of the autonomic nervous system regulates the various functions of the body. We alluded to this in the previous message. This is where the speed of light comes in. Physics, as it is being taught, gives a glimpse of this process. The nervous system is a vast network, comparable to a power station. Its function is primordial; the exchanges on the cellular level pass through this very complex organization. It is an admirable mechanism that is far from being understood.

There still remains much to be done to list the multiple capabilities of the human body. The essentials, namely the energies that power it, are not known as they should be. Vanished civilizations, very advanced in the knowledge of these phenomena, went a long way in treating certain disorders inherent in poor energy circulation.

Western medicine deliberately ignores this aspect of the human body, dwelling only on matter; it does not identify the real problems.

All light will be shed in the future on this 'impalpable' that baffles researchers. Most of them voluntarily leave it aside. A great revolution will be needed on this point for the good of human beings, who will suffer, more and more, from inexplicable disruptions due to numerous forms of pollution.
