Whispers from The Brighter World

Monday, October 30, 2000 – 8:00 a.m.

Colour your own sky, let your thoughts embellish it and your words remain like light clouds that move across it without darkening it.

Watch yourself constantly, my child. Having reached the crossroads, it is necessary to make a choice. Remember the ascent of a mountain and the difficulty of reaching the summit. This ultimate climb requires much rigour; everything is counted in the least detail.

One false step can jeopardize everything. Such is the law. We insist on this point so that you all do not reproach us for being demanding, since we demand nothing – we only suggest, to make the climb easier for you.

One needs to know the altitude one wants to reach. The mountain guide is intransigent, inflexible for the good, and in some cases, one might even say, for the survival of beings who put their trust in him.

He does not take them by force; they have chosen a goal to attain and he is there to help them, often in spite of themselves, in the face of difficulties that are bound to arise.

The struggle is rough, but the victory is so beautiful! Doesn't it deserve some effort?
