Whispers from The Brighter World

Friday, November 3, 2000 – 10:00 a.m.

Your world is in a bad way, I am not telling you anything new. The population has never reached such a density in certain countries around the globe.

This concentration of individuals and their way of life results in behaviour being exacerbated. The warlike instinct of a category of individuals manifests itself in all its force, aggravated by the extreme materialism of these so-called advanced civilizations. Urban violence is the result of an education system, which includes television, that doesn't limit itself to an entertaining or educational role, but excites minds to sink into all that leads human beings to ruin.

Our views are not retrograde; they indicate a social phenomenon that is not good.

Points of light should emerge more and more on this earth, even if these glimmers seem to get lost in the artificial lighting that bombards human beings in big cities. Too many excesses of all types will lead this civilization to a dangerous impasse.

It is time for governments to be aware of this reality.

This escalation has become out of control and impossible to modify, even through fully common sense decisions.

The movement is irreversible and will have to reach extremes to stop by itself.
