Whispers from The Brighter World

Wednesday, November 22, 2000 – 10:00 a.m.

We ask a lot of you, we understand your weariness. The state of your health isn't conducive to such an all-absorbing activity.

Your willingness and desire to satisfy us drive you forward.

My dear daughter, please believe that we appreciate it. We are going to slow down for a few days to let you recover.

Of the many messages received, some will hold, for a moment, the attention of those who read them. Other more discerning readers will perceive through these lines more than appears on first reading and they will nurture themselves spiritually from them.

Nothing can be forced. Hearts ready to receive them will receive according to their expectations.

You are doing what we expect of you, you cannot do anything more. Time will decide on the future life of these writings.

Rest assured, they won't be relegated to a drawer forever without having a life of their own.

Beware of your reactions; take care to keep all that you write. You mustn't do any sorting, everything must be retained. Time will tell in this regard. Those believing they are superior will be tempted to revise everything; you must be wary of this.
