Whispers from The Brighter World

Thursday, November 23, 2000 – 10:00 a.m.

You can take a break and look back. Look at the work you've done: the number of messages you have captured and that have been keyed in and printed in a format that's very easy to read. You have good reason to be delighted, even though we must give you a little break and reduce the pace to which we subject you.

There is a good harvest, believe me. Many people around you would be happy to make the most of it.

They would have all the eagerness required to read them. We understand your regret at not being able to make it so and at having to hide this activity, but you are well positioned to understand our reasons.

Discretion is not always easy to keep; that's how humans are. They are inclined in their turn to confide in others, and henceforth secrets come out.

Stay with the same setup for now. The time will come when the circle can be enlarged. The decision will be jointly taken by my son and you. Let's let minds evolve.

In these Western countries, one must be very prudent and wait for the right moment.
