Whispers from The Brighter World

Thursday, November 30, 2000 – 8:00 a.m.

You will not change the world; you can only note that it's beset by all sorts of preconceived ideas, taboos and manipulations.

Human beings can't always be discriminating. They are led to follow erroneous theories; for lack of really understanding the issues, they advance with the general flow.

In the field that preoccupies you, medicine, it's true that it brings back to the psyche whatever it can't grasp regarding the complexity of human functioning. It is said to play a major role that it doesn't have; it is only a part of the mechanism. Human beings do not create their own diseases. Their minds are an acting force, but other decisive factors come into play and are ignored in the current state of medical knowledge.

It will take a long time before the genuine trigger of disharmony between the various organs of the body is recognized as being the cause of most diseases.

It is useless to embark on this route and raise arguments that would not be admitted by a majority of people, trapped in current theories. For those who are convinced of the prevailing system of thought, such arguments would be pure fantasy.
