Whispers from The Brighter World

Friday, January 5, 2001 – 8:00 a.m.

The current foundations of psychoanalysis are made of nice theories, some of which are close to the truth, whereas others are completely erroneous.

The secret mechanisms of the human being have yet to be proven. Important discoveries will be made at the end of the century, which will put an end to the current approach to these phenomena that doesn't take into account a crucial fact – that which has been acquired as a result of former lives. This principle simplifies the basic assumptions, currently beyond the reach of the specialists, regarding these questions.

Everything is part of a pattern of evolution – that which was before and will come after – and has nothing to do with the codification prevailing at any given time.

This aspect of the human being is even more neglected and misunderstood than in other fields of medicine, where all the great current certainties are to be reconsidered. In a century, they will appear as aberrant as those of the distant past.

Scientists have too much certainty, this is what hinders their progress. The discovery of the human being goes hand in hand with the evolution of earthlings. There too, they must advance step by step and know themselves before claiming to know others.

One day, full light will be brought to bear on the complexity of human functioning.

Humans still have to progress before that happens.
