Whispers from The Brighter World

Thursday, February 22, 2001 – 10:00 a.m.

Life is a tough school. End-of-term exams are sometimes painful, but with hindsight, they soften hearts open enough to understand their significance. Wise people, who actually want to draw lessons from them, advance in life with a philosophy that strengthens them and forges an armour for them.

Well accepted, such trials make them advance, and they realize that these enrich their life. It takes much wisdom to get to this point, and one has to suffer enough, in acceptance, for the soul to emerge from this chaos in all its beauty.

The paths of life hold surprises until the end. The least resistance must be rooted out for the heart of the being to really emerge, in step with its Creator. Progress can be slow, but life takes its time. The soul blossoms at nature's pace, without abruptness.

You who have already understood all these principles and are not exasperated by our words, you have acquired a great wealth that you cannot lose, no matter what happens.
