Whispers from The Brighter World

Sunday, March 11, 2001 – 8:00 a.m.

You must not be afraid to write what we dictate to you. A new world completely different from the one you all are living in today will exist in future centuries.

Draw a parallel between what life was like in the eighteenth century and what it is nowadays. Would the most evolved people of those times have imagined what exists now, in every aspect?

Everything seems normal to you all and is taken as definitive, but the distance travelled in the next two centuries will be even more surprising. So you must take note, without the least reservation, even if you do not understand.

A new world is being prepared. None of you can imagine it. It is beyond your comprehension.

Your current civilization is built on a few principles that will no longer prevail in the future. Electricity, oil and its by-products, used in the present system, will be considered as antiques or simply forgotten. A complete revolution will have occurred at every level.

If vestiges of your civilization had to remain, they might be studied with curiosity. That is the way it's been since the beginning of time. Everything evolves and renews itself. Human beings end up going to the most glaring extremes; that must therefore be remedied. Everything changes and is transformed – it is in the order of things.
