Whispers from The Brighter World

Tuesday, April 10, 2001 – 10:00 a.m.

Don't worry, you've written exactly what we wanted; some things must be said. It's unfortunate that these messages don't reach a wide audience.

With regard to the previous topic, it is regrettable that these practices are allowed to continue. There is no need whatsoever to add anything to our method of spiritual development. Properly understood, it is more than sufficient. If our aspirants took the trouble to do their work assiduously, by respecting our teaching to the letter, they should be satisfied with it.

The question is, are they ready to commit themselves? Do they give their sadhana its rightful place? Without perseverance, nothing can be obtained.

A spiritual process is not a gadget. The minds of Westerners are solicited from all sides. Too much information reaches them; all kinds of systems are offered to them. Many people are totally confused in this world polluted at all levels.

They no longer find themselves as individuals, and they get carried away by this wave of excessive materialism. It is difficult for them to find the place that suits them in this society.
