Whispers from The Brighter World

Tuesday, April 17, 2001 – 8:00 a.m.

Compassion is the driving force of our action, for our earthling brothers and sisters, as well as for others on different planes of existence who are grappling with other problems of a different order from those of humans, but who deserve our attention.

There is suffering, a lot of suffering. We cannot remain indifferent to this, relishing unutterable joys while losing interest in our brothers and sisters, wherever they may be.

Compassion and love are one and the same. That which emanates from a heart attentive to his or her fellow humans cannot but bring relief from misery, whether physical or moral. Other worlds are in the grip of an intense moral suffering that is hard for you to imagine, as it is taking on such proportions. These beings are refined to such a point that everything affects them at the deepest level of their existing structure, wherever they are. This definition means nothing to you, but what other image could we give you all?

The more subtle the suffering, the more dreadful it is. In what circumstances and which places does it occur? We cannot go further into the subject now.

Know only that suffering doesn't belong only to this world and that developing compassion within yourselves is the desirable approach. By maintaining it in your hearts, you contribute to this universal spiritual communion which comes to the aid of worlds in distress.
