Whispers from The Brighter World

Sunday, November 21, 1999 – 8:00 a.m.

The human being is of such complexity that we do not really know how to act with you all. We shouldn't shock you, bore you, or give you traumatizing predictions. We do not blame you; we only try to draw your attention to some pitfalls that are likely to slow down your evolution. We are not 'bogeymen' and we only want the best for you. You have requested us to go further in these messages. It's true that there are many of them, but we should take advantage of the opportunity we've been given to transmit them to you. It will not last indefinitely and you will have the rest of your lives, if you so wish, to read and reread them. You may find them boring, repetitive, and they may weary you. If you regard them that way, we will not be shocked.

You will undoubtedly lose out, but that is your business. We propose them to you all, and you use them as you see fit. We will continue as long as it's possible to do so. They will have the life you wish to give them by paying attention to them. They are in your hands, they are entrusted to you, and it is up to you to decide what happens next.
