Sunday, July 25, 2004 - 10:00 AM

Despite his being caught in the movement of modern life, my son still assumes perfectly his role of high level spiritual Master. The Masters of the past lived in another context—worries existed, but life was less troubled; it was fostering an inner attitude and better open-mindedness. Humanly, he must have the lucidity and the capabilities of a head of a company capable of making the necessary decisions. He has been always able to reconcile both aspects of his mission, hence the resulting success.

"Given the importance of the Mission, our abhyasis must be conscious that he lacks time to listen to their personal matters concerning family and material life. Their first reaction must be to interiorize themselves and find within, in the silence of the heart and in connection with the Master, the expected answers. Acquiring this kind of automatic reflex becomes a power available to any aspirant.

"He is spiritually connected to the source, his work within the Mission makes him progress in this direction. With time, all becomes clearer in the heart of our brothers; practice is an invaluable help, it fosters coherence of emotions and feelings. They must hold their right place and not encroach on the essentials: the progress of the soul towards its higher destiny. Years of assiduous practice have transformed them—save for inevitable human reactions. A redemptive work, highly appreciated, is being achieved. May all our aspirants become aware of it and redouble their efforts."

Babuji