Monday, June 30, 2003 - 10:00 AM

Jealousy is a human shortcoming. It's like poison in hearts of human beings: a scourge detrimental to their evolution. By observing oneself closely, one can assess how much it has taken hold and make corrections as far as possible. A true brotherhood and sisterhood should be able to take root on this Earth. What seems completely utopian today could perhaps be achievable tomorrow. This world is entangled in the meshes of a net that's not easy to shake off. It has sunk into a mire from which virtue can hardly emerge and express the true nature of humankind. Our path, with the work that characterizes it, plays a significant cleansing role in this program. Its first goal is liberation which, if generalized, would be no small matter.

By working globally to that end, our system is meeting the requirements of this dawning century, which should lead human beings to a collective awareness of their true nature, divine in essence.

It is being battered more than ever in this magma, constraining it in its current cycle of evolution and preventing it from advancing at the planned pace. All means will have to be used to clean up humanity, struggling to disentangle itself from its gangue – which does not radically differentiate it from the other kingdoms, as humans are inclined to believe. Life remains a mystery for them, and they would be astounded by reality if they were to access it.

Babuji