In a quarter of a century, the Earth will experience a major turbulence. That will be the beginning of a cycle which Earthmen will find very difficult to go through. Fire will literally beat down on certain parts of the world whereas torrents of rain will pour over others. Cataclysms will follow one another for many long years, keeping men frightened. Many will turn toward a supreme God beseeching his forgiveness. Forgiveness for more and more aberrant behaviours, as well as for the maltreatment imposed on their nourishing mother, the Earth.

"The failure to respect the elements will lead to effects generating terror among the population of the end of the century. In future ages, the present layout of the continents will be shattered. Maps will need revising. Yet the creatures inhabiting this planet will have more than enough to do in order to survive rather than dealing with those details. Atom will turn against mankind, who will not have been able to harness it, and its lightening power will be devastating. The time for punishment for such a conceit will take place as hard as it can and man, paying for his ancestors' glaring mistakes, will suffer without having any control over the situation.

"The transformation of this planet must go through all these cataclysms in order to be effectively completed."
