Friday, January 5, 2001 - 8:00 AM

The current foundations of psychoanalysis are nice theories, some of which are close to the truth, whereas others are completely erroneous. The secret mechanisms of the human being remain yet to be proved. At the end of the century, critical discoveries will be made which will put an end to the current approach to these phenomena which does not take account of a crucial fact, i.e., the inheritance resulting from former lives. This principle makes easier, elements that are hitherto beyond the understanding of the specialists in these subjects.

"Everything is part and parcel of an evolutionary process, which has applied in the past, and will apply in the future. It has nothing to do with the codification prevailing nowadays. This reality of the human being is even more disregarded and ignored than in other fields of medicine, where all the current major convictions are to be re-considered. In a century, they will be seen to have been as absurd as those of a distant past.

"Scientists have too much certitude, which is what hinders their progress. The discovery of man goes hand in hand with the evolution of Earthmen. There too, they must progress step by step and know themselves, before claiming to know others.

"One day, all the truth about the complexity of human functioning will be brought to light. Men must yet grow up beforehand."

Babuji