Thursday, March 27, 2003 - 10:00 AM

The infinitely great and the infinitely small merge; they vibrate from the same divine energy which animates the entire creation. All that lives on this Earth is alike, since they emanate from the same source. Species differ from one another by specific characteristics, but they unify in that they have this common point. In that respect, each of them deserves to be observed. Creation is not completely seen from this perspective, yet this aspect is important.

"Man is part of this Great Whole in this universal plan, created by a single and divine will, indecipherable to him, whatever his level of intelligence. The day when knowledge will be spread in a more advanced world—more capable of grasping the great mysteries of creation—will surely dawn, and the human being will remain amazed by discoveries which would be completely far away from what seems to be an absolute conviction today.

"Since the beginning of time, man has been moving from discovery to discovery and he believes, at each point in time, that he possesses the truth. Time will come when it will appear to him for good; from that day on he will no longer resemble his ancestor, i.e., as he is today, with fixed convictions.

"May this advent happen on Earth. It would bring knowledge and a higher level of evolution to beings that will populate it, having acquired a new status. It would support a more enlightening life that fosters their progress towards the divine goal."

Babuji