Wednesday, January 28, 2004 - 10:00 AM

A soul divested of useless aspects, progressing towards perfection, does not burden itself anymore with superfluous formulas and words. The obviousness leads it and motivates it; the language of the heart is enough for it. It does not any longer burden itself with grand philosophical theories, which, in its view, are utterly useless. This attitude results from a long process. After having wandered in vain, from life to life, moving from one teaching to another, all the light eventually appeared. Love becomes its only food, supported by signs emanating from the Divine and inspired by way of an essential accompaniment to its blossoming.

"Ultimately, all comes down to the greatest simplicity. The approach to God requires simplicity that is essential to the needs of the soul, given its necessity to commune with itself and to love, above all. The way to that achievement was difficult and very long. So many wanderings, fruitless mistakes, and sufferings before reaching the divine source—that from where it can finally drink!

"It does not stop praising more and more, but rather it now exults, delighted to be back in its fatherland. Here, no disappointment can occur. It is good to know that such a process culminates in the purest joy. No effort is useless. In this field, all is numbered, scrupulously. What can one hide from the Creator of everything? He is within us. His essence dwells in us and feeds us according to our needs and our aspirations. It is for us to make sure that this food makes our soul divine, at the highest level of the universal conception.

"May all souls reach this sublime apotheosis!"

Babuji