Sunday, August 22, 2004 - 10:00 AM

What would you have been without love? Can you imagine life without that dimension? Would you pluck up the courage and strength to do this work every day while your body is craving for rest? All the magic of divine love lies there; it operates in the hearts being offered to it. We experienced the effects of it when we were incarnate in this world where we went through all possible states before leaving it.

"Difficult moments allow man to look further into his true nature and to see what he is capable of. Easiness cannot facilitate such assessments. The dimension given by love to the seemingly simplest life is important; it widens its spiritual horizons. Whatever the social position or the standard of living, nothing can give to the being, in its most subtle nature, the desirable balance and harmony for its blossoming. This fact is not new; a human being keeps his prerogatives since he has been moving from life to life, in view of a rise leading it to the goal.

"Without this underlying power, nothing would happen on Earth; humans would have been doomed to inertia. In the current karma of this planet, no regression is envisaged; quite to the contrary, we are sufficiently putting the emphasis in these messages on its future, completely contrary to that.

"The wheel of life always swings around. In the entire creation, nothing escapes divine laws. From the infinitely great to the infinitely small, all is subjected to them. Uniting with God is the supreme goal, the purpose for which we are striving in this world and elsewhere.

"So it is: the celestial mechanics work perfectly and we are the elements of it that are operating in its service."

Babuji