

Tuesday, November 16, 2004 - 10:00 AM

Human beings are seized by a frantic appetite for life, for knowledge, and they are rushing with a view of actually reaching what is within them and which cannot disappoint them, contrary to the deceptive effects of the material world. Some tribes, protected from this outrageous civilization, keep an ancestral wisdom, naturally connecting them to the essential values. This minority is appreciable; it is the custodian of a tradition where respect for the divine laws prevails.

"The so-called modern life misleads a man avid for all kinds of feelings and who generally, respects neither the divine laws nor even those established by men. A collective madness has taken hold of this world, and it will actually need to be subdued one way or the other. Poor is the one who ignores his true nature and who blithely tramples the elementary laws of good behaviour underfoot. To harm others, is also to create one's own frightening karma, which nothing here below will be able to erase.

"On this Earth this evil is taking on frightening dimensions. How can men be made to see reason? The future will tell. The pursuit of pleasure cannot lead a civilization to the highest level of realization. Many souls are emerging from that degrading context: noble souls in search of the Divine are craving for beauty and purity, and constitute a hope for this world which is drifting away.

"May humanity pull itself together in time and set out again in the right direction."

Babuji