Sunday, November 28, 2004 - 10:00 AM

To put on a physical body is inevitably to deprive oneself of extrasensory perceptions, and a range of knowledge not pertaining to this world. That is how things are; science cannot change anything about this, neither now or ever.

"Anything belonging to this world is limited; man should understand it, the most erudite one must accept it, if he is a wise man. Some of them are wise; they recognize their limitations and they do not claim to be able to change the world. They admit in addition that progress, as they conceive it, does not make man any happier. He creates more and more needs and in the final analysis, he complicates his own life, recognizing that his ancestors had a simpler life that was not necessarily less happy.

"Some human beings have gifts, quite remarkable perceptions, and they are not recognized as is proper in a superficial world not attentive to extraordinary things. Many claim they have those gifts, but they are only pale imitations, their information generally coming from a lower astral level.

"All these phenomena are not recognized, whatever their level of truth, and they are generally ridiculed by ignorant people. We cannot change anything about it. How will our brothers receive these messages? The most open-minded will be able to tell the difference and recognize the authenticity of these writings. Prophecies by certain beings marked history, without their sources being updated or challenged.

"That does not matter, the voice of wisdom makes itself heard whenever possible; happy are those who pay attention to it. Our spiritual way will not be outdone in tomorrow's world that will be open to the many capabilities of human brain, receptacle of a knowledge unexploited because it is currently ignored."

Babuji