Thursday, August 24, 2000 - 10:00 a.m.

hannelling is something you don't acquire through exercises or the desire for it. It is a state, a more or less important gift, which develops with age and sometimes tests. I had this gift, but my son does not have it and I cannot give it to him. He is the Master; he has the power as well as everything we keep transmitting to him, but not that one. He must put up with it. This point is worth insisting on. He does not prove himself unworthy for all that; his mission lies elsewhere. It is colossal and nobody around him really realizes it, not even he himself; it has always been like that. The great people whom you have been venerating for centuries were not recognized truly for what they were and the role they played for humanity. Some underwent the worst affronts before being recognized by their followers. Situations are renewed; humans have blinkers. They realize the greatness of some missioned beings after they have left this Earth to return to their fatherland. The teaching they leave makes its way into people's minds and the most open ones assimilate it and convey it. It is a series of new beginnings."

Babuji