Sunday, October 29, 2000 – 8:00 a.m.

We have been drawing your attention to the ravages of pollution for a long time. Governments hide the seriousness of the situation.

"Having enough to eat is a problem for many individuals on Earth, but one day soon, it will become widespread, even for those who are well off.

"Pollution is in the soil, in the air that you breathe and around the globe. These different kinds of pollution overlap and will bring about increasing difficulties, particularly with regard to food.

"Political leaders will not be able to bury their heads in the sand indefinitely. Talking about these cases of sick cows is not enough. In the future, all animals will know difficulties of this nature.

"The plant kingdom is not spared. To a lesser extent, it shows similar risks due to farming methods which add to the various forms of pollution.

"If agriculture, livestock farming and all that relates to food are not reviewed and corrected in a radical way, there will be serious problems.

"More and more, you should be very vigilant about your nutrition; your health hinges on that."

Babuji